In the event of a portion of the cushion becoming worn or otherwise flawed, the cushion can be replaced. The cushion is generally associated with an upholstery material of a suitable length and width and is attached to a frame. The cushion is accordingly provided with end portions which can be slipped over the end portions of the frame. In order to attach the cushion to the frame, it is known to fasten a plurality of fasteners through the cushion and frame, for example, using blind rivets. In many cases, the position of the fasteners is fixed, and it is accordingly necessary to provide a cushion with matching holes which are correctly arranged for this purpose. In general, the cushion must be processed with skilled manual labour by highly-skilled craftsman, or is pre-assembled with a corresponding number of fasteners attached to a frame member in order to allow inspection of the position of the fasteners before they are installed. Cushions are also known in which the position of the fasteners is adjustable, for example in the manner disclosed in FR-A-1,448,850, which describes an adjustable fastener comprising a locking head provided with locking lugs and an extension tapering along the longitudinal axis and passing through a hole in the front of the cushion. The tapering extension is adapted to pass through a bore in the frame and/or through one or more slots in the framework. The tapering extension is slidably mounted within a corresponding opening in the cushion, and the locking head can be engaged to the cushion in a manner which is appropriate for the particular seat application. In FR-A-1,448,850, the tapering extension can be engaged to the cushion by a variety of methods, including the use of a special member for this purpose. It has been proposed to construct cushions using an injection-

A method of gas-chromatography-electron-capture-detector (GC-ECD) was developed for the determination of thiamin in human hair. After washing hair, 10% trichloroacetic acid was used to dissolve thiamin. In preliminary experiments, the extraction efficiencies of the following compounds from human hair were measured: thiamin, riboflavin, N-acetyl-L-diaminopimelic acid, putrescine, cadaverine and agmatine. Thiamin was extracted nearly completely from the hair matrix. The recovery of thiamin averaged 100% and ranged from 96 to 114% when 10 mg of hair were used. Thiamin and riboflavin had similar extraction efficiencies. The hair content of thiamin ranged from 0.37 to 2.5 microg per 100 mg of hair. The assay of hair thiamin was simple and rapid.These statements have not been evaluated by the FDA, and are not intended to diagnose, treat or cure any disease.
